When, it a subsequent period of your remarks, you attributed to me statements which I had not made, I requested that in quoting me you would do so truthfully. These remarks were certainly not "deliberately premeditated," but they cannot be qualified correctly as the "impulse of momentary passion." The first was prompted by a determination to defend the honor and character of any son, as dear to me as my own, against an attack so general in its terms as necessarily to include him; and the second was the exercise of my right to reetify a misrepresentation of my own remarks. Democratic Harmony.

We observe, with unfeigned satisfaction, that Co gnal of union and harmony thrown out by the Democracy of Kentucky has been accepted in a responsive spirit by the party in other quarters of the country. The fact of Judge Douglas' participation in a recent conens of Democratic Sena-tors, is the occasion of felicitation among the organs of the party, inasumch as it implies on obliviou of past issues, and promises a fraternal association in future struggles. We may now regard the Kansus breach as thoroughly repaired.

At the residence of her son, C. M.
